

the 1990s, the number of people with a diagnosis of schizophrenia has increased in many countries, including the United Kingdom (Murray & Lewis, 1998). The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998). The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

The prevalence of schizophrenia is estimated to be 1% of the population (Murray & Lewis, 1998).