

Figure 1. Percentage of respondents who believe that the U.S. should take a more active role in international affairs.

U.S. Role in International Affairs

Figure 1 shows that the majority of respondents believe that the U.S. should take a more active role in international affairs. This belief has increased over time, from 55% in 1991 to 85% in 1998.

The increase in support for a more active U.S. role in international affairs is consistent with the findings of other studies. For example, a 1997 survey by the Pew Research Center found that 77% of Americans believe that the U.S. should take a more active role in international affairs. This finding is similar to the results shown in Figure 1.

There are several reasons why Americans may believe that the U.S. should take a more active role in international affairs. One reason is that the U.S. is the world's superpower, and it has a responsibility to lead the world. Another reason is that the U.S. has a long history of international involvement, and it is natural for Americans to support this involvement.

Figure 2 shows that the majority of respondents believe that the U.S. should take a more active role in international affairs. This belief has increased over time, from 55% in 1991 to 85% in 1998.