

THE UNIVERSITY OF CHICAGO
DEPARTMENT OF POLITICAL SCIENCE
POLITICAL SCIENCE 301

1. The first part of the course will focus on the theoretical foundations of political science, including the study of power, authority, and the state. We will explore the works of classical political theorists such as Aristotle, Machiavelli, and Hobbes, as well as modern theorists like Weber and Rawls. This section will provide a solid grounding in the key concepts and debates of the discipline.

2. The second part of the course will examine the historical development of political systems and institutions. We will analyze the evolution of democracy, the rise of the nation-state, and the impact of globalization on international relations. This section will help students understand the context in which political events occur and the forces that shape the world we live in.

3. The final part of the course will focus on contemporary political issues and challenges. We will discuss topics such as the environment, human rights, and the role of technology in politics. This section will encourage students to think critically about current events and to develop their own perspectives on the future of the world.

4. Throughout the course, students will be encouraged to engage in active learning and to participate in class discussions. We will use a variety of teaching methods, including lectures, readings, and group projects. This approach will help students develop their analytical and communication skills, and will provide them with the opportunity to learn from each other.

5. The course will also include a final exam and a research paper. The exam will test students' understanding of the course material, while the research paper will allow them to explore a topic of interest in greater depth. These assignments will be designed to assess students' ability to apply the concepts and theories learned in the course to real-world situations.
