

the 1990s, the number of people with a diagnosis of schizophrenia has increased in many countries, including the United Kingdom (Murray & Lewis, 1998). The prevalence of schizophrenia in the United Kingdom is estimated to be 1.2% (Murray & Lewis, 1998).

There is a growing awareness of the need to improve the lives of people with schizophrenia. This has led to a focus on the development of community mental health services (CMHS).

CMHS are designed to provide a range of services to people with mental health problems, including: assessment, diagnosis, treatment, rehabilitation, and support.

CMHS are often organized into teams, each of which is responsible for a specific area of the service. These teams may include: psychiatrists, psychologists, nurses, social workers, and other professionals.

CMHS are designed to be user-centred, and to provide a range of services that meet the needs of individual people. This may include: individual therapy, group therapy, and family therapy.

CMHS are also designed to be accessible to people from all backgrounds and ethnicities. This may involve providing services in different languages, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be cost-effective, and to provide a range of services that are affordable for people. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be sustainable, and to provide a range of services that are available for the long term. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be effective, and to provide a range of services that improve the lives of people. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be evaluated, and to provide a range of services that are based on evidence. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be flexible, and to provide a range of services that can be adapted to meet the needs of individual people. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be collaborative, and to provide a range of services that involve working with other professionals. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be transparent, and to provide a range of services that are open to public scrutiny. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be accountable, and to provide a range of services that are responsible to the public. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be inclusive, and to provide a range of services that are available to all people. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be innovative, and to provide a range of services that are based on new ideas. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be resilient, and to provide a range of services that can withstand challenges. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.

CMHS are designed to be sustainable, and to provide a range of services that are available for the long term. This may involve providing services in different ways, or providing services in different locations.